Thomas Cook

Thomas Cook is one of the UK's largest holiday companies. It includes brands such as Club 18-30 and Thomson Cruises, as well as a travel agency business with 780 high street outlets.

In 2011, Thomas Cook proposed a merger with The Co-operative Travel, a chain of travel agents with 360 high street outlets in the UK. This merger was referred to the Competition Commission because of fears that it might make it harder for smaller, independent holiday companies that were currently selling through The Co-operative Travel to continue to access the market. The merger might also result in customers having less choice of holidays and paying higher prices.

The merger could lead to hundreds of job losses with the closure of some of the high street outlets and to other cost savings being made.

A spokesperson for Thomas Cook said that the travel industry needed to consolidate and become more efficient following a terrible year in which holiday companies and travel agents had suffered from the recession, rising oil prices and bad weather. He estimated that the merger could lead to overall savings of £35 million a year.
